Each topic carries 40 marks.

Topic 1 The British Constitution

Read the extract below and answer questions 0 1, 0 2 and 0 3 which follow.

Common Law and the Constitution

Common law, sometimes referred to as case law or judge-made law, is based on precedent. It is formed from a growing collection of court decisions in specific legal cases throughout history. Common law is particularly useful for resolving uncertainties in other constitutional sources. On the other hand, it can be very untidy, leaving judges to make sense of a confusing number of precedents. Examples from hundreds of important cases include Anderson v. Gorrie in 1895 (the immunity of judges) and Bradlaugh v. Gossett in 1884 (the supremacy of Parliament over its internal affairs). Common law has also developed many 'civil rights'.

Although important in developing the constitution, the common law is not confined to great cases of the past. As recently as 1999, in DPP v. Jones, the House of Lords reversed a conviction by the Salisbury magistrates made under recent public order legislation. The House of Lords found that a peaceful assembly on the grass verge beside the A344 at Stonehenge did not constitute trespass.

Topic 2 Parliament

Read the extract below and answer questions 0 4, 0 5 and 0 6 which follow.

Labour and House of Lords Reform

Diary entry of Tony Benn (Energy Secretary prior to 1979 General Election):

To Number 10 for the Cabinet manifesto meeting in the Dining Room. On the Lords, I tried my hand at another draft, put in the most attractive way I could: 'We will reform and strengthen the procedures of the House of Commons to enable it to undertake all the work of the House of Lords and we shall introduce a bill to bring an end to the role of the House of Lords as a legislative assembly'. 5

Well, I may have compromised too early but I had in mind that Jim (Callaghan – the Prime Minister) had said he would resign the leadership rather than have a statement on abolition of the House of Lords. I introduced my draft and a tremendous debate followed.

I said the Lords had the power to delay legislation, 'patronage' was an abuse, power in our society was too centralised, and it had to be dealt with. Against me was Peter Shore (minister) who made a passionate speech saying that no one knew what to put in its place. 10

Topic 3 The Core Executive

Read the extract below and answer questions 0 7, 0 8 and 0 9 which follow.

The Prime Minister

The prime minister is the head of the government. He or she provides political leadership within the 'cabinet system' and the country, chairs the cabinet, appoints ministers and is leader of the largest party in the House of Commons. Certain requirements must be fulfilled for a person to become prime minister.

First, he or she must be a member of the Westminster Parliament. Until the late nineteenth century the prime minister was usually a member of the House of Lords. As the House of Commons emerged as the dominant chamber, it became a constitutional convention that the prime minister should be an MP in the Commons. 5

Secondly, he or she must be leader of a political party. The prime minister must have the support of his or her party. If they are forced to step down as party leader they also give up the office of prime minister, as happened when Margaret Thatcher failed to achieve victory in the Conservative Party leadership election in 1990. 10 which follow.

The Council of Ministers

It is important to remember that the Council of Ministers is the EU institution that belongs to the member governments. Regular contact and a pattern of socialisation mean that the Council, and especially its 'specialist formations', develop a spirit of good will. Sometimes 'clubs' of ministers (for example, those with an interest in agriculture, or dealing with the environment, etc) are able to use agreements in Brussels to force their own governments to make commitments that might not have been accepted at national level. However, the ministers and officials who meet in the Council are servants of their governments. Thus, their first priority is generally to pursue whatever seems to be the preferred objective of national policy.

Much of the time, the Council is the forum for discussion on the member governments' responses to the European Commission's proposals. In practice it is generally considered desirable that unanimity is found. To achieve this, voting is characterised by complex bargaining and the making of compromises.
